S&D president, Iratxe García Pérez, on Europe's democratic renewal needs a feminist slant

The Conference on the Future of Europe shouldn't degenerate into political theatre.
Instead, politicians need to listen and give a voice to citizens

If the Covid-19 outbreak has taught us anything, it's that preparedness for crises is crucial to save lives. In order to be better prepared, we need to have a discussion about the future of the European Union. And not just among politicians. This is where the Conference on the Future of Europe comes in, which had been proposed already before the pandemic because, even back then, it was necessary to update our common vision and to speed up decision-making in our Union of 27 member states.

Now, the time has come to get out of the 'Brussels bubble', listen to people and advance towards a feminist Europe. We need a new concept of power, a new approach to representative democracy and a new mindset in the EU institutions. This transformation should also be reflected in the institutional architecture. We must ensure that the Conference plenary does not just become a political theatre for EU politicians to debate among themselves. Instead, it needs to be a forum to give a voice to citizens.

This is why I insisted that all seven political groups in the European Parliament must be represented on the Conference's Executive Board, to ensure that the widest spectrum of opinions are heard. And this is also why the European Parliament, as the body directly elected by European citizens, should be leading this democratic process.

In order to instil an innovative approach into the Conference, I take three lessons from the Covid-19 crisis.

Deepening democracy and empowering people

Firstly, there is a discrepancy between citizens' high expectations and what the EU can actually deliver. The fact that citizens have such high expectations is good news for those of us who believe that co-operating to solve our problems will benefit everyone, as opposed to

Victor Hugo, a great European, said ‘the future is for the brave’, so let’s dare to change.

The market does not reward sectors that are critical for the well-being of our society – and the occasional applause is just not enough. The market does not contribute to a cohesive and fair society, but increases social division. So it's time to build our European Pillar of Social Rights. Europe’s citizens are demanding it – and only our political family has the experience, the vision and the leadership to advance that fight. And here we need everyone on board, all our partners and all progressive voices in society.

The third lesson is about the existing divides between west and east, north and south. There are many unspoken perceptions of superiority and inferiority that have been exposed once more during this crisis. Some Europeans feel like second-class citizens because their voices are not heard, because they never see themselves represented in the top posts of their institutions, because they feel patronised by the big countries or the ‘old’ European member states.

It's time to address this gap openly, to be sincere and to overcome it. This is part of a necessary change of mind-set: there are no more old and new members. We are all co-owners of the project. This also means going to the regional level, far from the capitals, going to Europe’s peripheries and to all neighbourhoods, to hear the diversity of voices.

A feminist approach to power avoids competition and encourages co-operation. This also applies to governance. Therefore, the Socialists and Democrats have insisted throughout the process that we closely involve national parliaments and all levels of administration. City halls and local governments have a crucial role because they are closest to citizens and where policies are actually implemented: health, education, housing, public transport and policies to support the ecological transition. This is where we first experience the sense of community and we learn to live together in diversity.

We should not be afraid to be flexible and to have an open-ended discussion. That includes the finishing date for the Conference. Before we can say when the process should come to a close, we first have to see the dynamic it creates among citizens. If we succeed in engaging all voices, we should make the most of it – and probably run the Conference until 2023 to draw our conclusions.
